

Win/loss interview questions

In their simplest form, win/loss interviews help you find out why a sales opportunity converted into a customer or chose a competitor over you, or perhaps chose no one at all. They take the guesswork out of the equation and enable you to understand what is and isn't working for you – and subsequently make changes to win more and lose less in the future.

The questions you ask during your win/loss interviews will depend on your specific circumstances and should be mapped against the three stages of the buying funnel: awareness, consideration, and decision. To help you on your way, here are some questions to choose from for each.

Awareness: This is the stage where the customer realizes they have a problem and begins researching solutions to solve it.

Consideration: By this point, the customer has a shortlist of providers and they begin to compare things like features, price and reviews with your competition.

Decision: Crunch time. This is the final stage of the customer's process and where they ultimately decide to choose you, your competitor, or carry on without a solution at all.
